What's new:

The Palais de Reine (;) was the name of various palaces of the House of Bourbon-Two Sicilies. The first and best known palace in Naples was built by Ferdinand II, his second wife Maria Cristina of Austria, and his son Ferdinand, its first occupant. Built between 1732-40 and completed in 1740, the Palais de Reine comprised three courtyards, 365 rooms, seven statues, 230 paintings, and 11 statues. The buildings were among the largest in Europe, and they became the first palace to be described as a "Versailles" or "Versailles on the sea". It was the residence of Ferdinand III in his youth, and was the nominal site of the royal court and government of the Bourbon-Two Sicilies in the 19th and 20th century. It was where the succession to the two thrones of the House of Bourbon-Two Sicilies passed, and where the birthplaces of all of Ferdinand II's and his daughter Marie Louise of Austria's children were located. History Background Since acquiring dominion over the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies in 1720, King Charles III of Spain and his daughter Queen Maria Luisa of Savoy were continuously building palaces as the main residence of the Royal Family, located in the area called Anfiteatro Real ("Royal Stable"). This real-mansion, dating back to Charles III's first wife, Isabella Farnese, was located west of the San Carlo Opera theatre. Between Charles III and Queen Maria Luisa, more than 170 palaces/residences of the Royal Family were completed in Naples, and the town of Reggio Muraglioso became the favourite summer or winter residence of the Queen, because of the small climate and green landscape. The main residence of the King and Queen of Naples was the Antitesegi Palace in Antitesegi, and the summer residence of the court was the Villa della Quarquonia (now Villa San Giorgio) in Forio in Aguglia, reputed to be amongst the most sunny spots in the area. In 1804, already the father of Ferdinand II of the Two Sicilies, Ferdinand I also occupied Palazzo Reale a Cavallo ("Palace of the Horse"), located far to the north of Anfiteatro Real, and in 1848, the future Ferdinand II himself moved to this new Palazzo for the winter season, because the old residence was too large
