Q: How does an inverse (or transpose) matrix exist? So the inverse of a matrix is a matrix that when multiplied by a matrix yields the identity matrix. The transpose of a matrix is a matrix that when multiplied with the matrix has the opposite effect: the matrix becomes a diagonal matrix. So since I know that multiplication is commutative, I think that inversion does not have an inherent meaning. However, if you consider matrix multiplication instead of matrix multiplication by matrix products, then inversion or transposition has a natural place in the space and is mathematically well defined (you just apply your knowledge of `bff6bb2d33`)

Yeah, that's something to keep in mind. -VAT has been spotted by someone at YouTube which link at the end of the page, it's really about...
