Acanthamoeba species have been associated with severe lung infections in patients with cystic fibrosis, especially after ingestion of contaminated water. However, the conditions under which these patients become infected are not well understood and the clinical spectrum of infections is not well delineated. In the present study the isolation of Acanthamoeba trophozoites from the airways of patients suffering from cystic fibrosis was directly identified by scanning electron microscopy and immunofluorescence microscopy. Bronchoalveolar lavage fluid (BALF) was obtained from 12 cystic fibrosis patients and the presence of Acanthamoeba was verified by Gram staining and direct microscopy. Amoebae were isolated on non-nutrient agar plates in four cases, whereas Acanthamoeba was cultured on non-nutrient agar plates and on Escherichia coli at a concentration of $10(7)$ cells/mL in two cases. The identity of isolated amoebae was confirmed by scanning electron microscopy and double immunofluorescence microscopy. The present results indicate that Acanthamoeba does not represent a prominent cause of infection in cystic fibrosis patients but that the prevalence of infections
