1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a semiconductor device equipped with a protective diode for absorbing surge.

2. Description of the Related Art A semiconductor device using a silicon carbide (SiC) substrate, i.e., a silicon carbide semiconductor device, has a higher withstand voltage and a higher temperature operation than a silicon semiconductor device and is less susceptible to noise.

Therefore, it is expected that a silicon carbide semiconductor device will be in increasing demand in the next-generation semiconductor devices. A common application for a silicon carbide semiconductor device is a power semiconductor device.

However, in order to meet a demand for a reduction in power loss, high-temperature operation and high-withstand voltage, high-temperature operation in the range of 600° C. to 850° C. is increasingly required in a semiconductor device. A silicon carbide semiconductor device has a problem in that a phenomenon called latch-up occurs due to strong electric field concentration and static latent charge on a die surface. The occurrence of the latch-up is greatly affected by the characteristics of a protective diode provided in the semiconductor device. In a conventional silicon carbide semiconductor device, a protective diode is formed of a PN junction diode in an epitaxial layer. The conventional silicon carbide semiconductor device is not suitable for use at an operation temperature of 1000° C. or above due to the existence of a material having a high melting point, such as, for example, a silicon nitride (Si₃N₄). Thus, the conventional silicon carbide semiconductor device has the problem that
