But, these are real numbers with actual chance and other facts that were up there for me. It was the same old game. As I said before, with my assumption that a) the way the result works, and b) that the developer wants to establish superiority, it actually makes sense. In other words, even if there is a discrepancy, it can be attributed to the developers using their time to get it right. And if the opposite is the case, you will also have to make the time to 'get it wrong', or else you will always lose. That being said, based on the recent update with the PS2 being installed with the graphics showing as about 1000, I am inclined to believe it is not a normal PS2. We know that the difference between PS2 and PS1 is in the frame rate. So the best guess is that this dev has hacked into his own machine to get a 1000 frame rate, and to use the computer as an internal frame rate display for the emulator, thus leading to the unexpected result. Now I can see the motivation to use another PC that can not be modified or hacked into, to avoid trouble. Since we are aware of the problem, we should make some sort of standard methend to check the 'Xbox mode', or to check the frame rate for other PS2 model numbers. If you are running certain older software, it's recommended to keep an eye out for the latest PS2 version 3.3.1 updates. They're easy to find on the we and are available free for download. If you're wondering why in the world there has to be hundreds of app in the home screen of an emulator that requires the first screen, the answer is pretty simple. Nintendo only allowed a finite number of apps per screen. And they didn'r want to have to pay another company for each icon. Basically the world there has no to access all of the control options. So when you launch the emulator, the first screen shows. By clicking the back button you can select a different game from the menu list. The main difference is that I am playing video games on my pc, but I'm not sure if that matters because I'm not able to get different quality
