I need to access email and internet applications on my home laptop using my iPhone. So I need my home phone and a DSL connection to work with. I currently use my home phone (no DSL) to access email using IMAP on a separate computer. We recently did a new cell phone plan where we bought the cheapest phone possible, and only have 1 home phone line. I have decided to use that phone line for internet access since I have a computer already on my local network. The problem is, I don't have DSL available where I live, and I have no plans to get DSL since I plan to use my cell phone only for the internet (which I rarely use now). Currently, I have my DSL modem and router hooked up in a closet upstairs where I access it via a wan router. At home, I have my VOIP phone hooked up. So, I was thinking that instead of hooking up my internet using my home DSL modem, I would hook it up with the DSL that I have right now. The router would be placed upstairs, and then the internet would be plugged into the DSL that I have. Then I would connect my wireless router downstairs and then access the internet using my cell phone. With this method, I would be able to access email through my iPhone, my main router would be running my VOIP phone, and since I am only have 1 phone line available, I wouldn't have to use it for internet access. Is this correct? Would I have to use a DSL modem at my c6a93da74d
