ChronoTrack Professional 1.75.0 Full Version - ChronoTrack Professional is a detailed time-tracking application for individuals and businesses. It's not a substitute for paper and pencil, but it does provide a convenient way to track time spent on tasks, projects, and time sheets. Search for software by topic, or type the name of the program you are interested in. On the first page found, select the "Download" option at the top of the window. You can also select "Official site" to download software that was taken from the author's website.

Q: What does it mean if an op-amp circuit doesn't show push-pull output? I'm quite new to op-amps. This is my understanding so far: A LM324 is a voltage doubler device. The output is mirrored against the input and then fed into a differential amplifier to amplify the input difference. I have 2 LM324s in a push-pull configuration for a differential amplifier that should show a negative output when both the inputs are low. The output is not what I expect. The inputs shorted at the collector (that's not what I expected at all!) and there are 2 sets of resistors in between the bases. What does that mean exactly?

A: The problem is most likely your power supply. In the data sheet the first figure shows that Vee supply should be  $\pm 15V$  and the second figure shows that source resistance should be 1k. The actual datasheet says 5V (between inverting and non-inverting inputs, at the source resistance of 5k). If you look at your diagram, you can see that the power supply is likely to be not quite as specified and this would explain the changes that you see. You have assumed that -15V = high, +15 = low (which is valid for single-ended opamps), the information on the datasheet is that the output of the comparator is at about -8V, which is not what the LM324 is designed to do.

So young who could say that they don't want to be like their parents or become successful like them. Now let's learn from our parents... Unfortunately because of the fact that most of our parents are not successful. There are many reasons for this. It can be because they don't get enough education, training or guidance; their job or career is not suited for them, their education is not enough
