Depression affects one in ten people over the age of 65 years and one in five people over the age of 75 years. It is the most common mental health problem among older people, contributing significantly to morbidity and mortality. Depression is also a major health problem among older children and adolescents. Despite the known effectiveness of pharmacological and psychosocial treatments, many older patients and their families are reluctant to seek treatment for depression. A large number of patients do not respond well to psychotropic medications or cannot tolerate them. The usual alternative is counseling which, as a nonpharmacological treatment, is usually cost effective. Cost-effectiveness is a significant issue for older people with chronic and recurrent depression who cannot afford counseling, require self-management, have Medicare conditions that limit their access to care, or do not require counseling due to living alone. In addition, older people prefer counseling to pharmacotherapy. Unfortunately, the effectiveness of individual counseling in reducing depression symptoms among older patients has not been studied in controlled or randomized trials. Fortunately, in a previous NIMH study of individual and family-based counseling for depression, those receiving counseling showed significantly greater improvement in their depression symptoms. However, the NIMH study was not designed for the comparison of individual counseling with counseling in groups with a similar composition, where patients could more easily learn from one another and from counselors. In addition, while the NIMH study was successful, the innovative part of the project had already been completed and costs associated with the design and delivery of the individual counseling were no longer necessary. This proposal will randomize patients to counseling or self 79a2804d6b
