I've been trying to understand a certain part of the physics involved in the wire chamber in the LHC, and I cannot quite get my head around one thing. In the theory part of the paper, it seems to suggest that in a single bunch crossing, an electron (or positron) can annihilate into a vacuum by a photo-emission-annihilation, while the positive electron can be captured into a bound state. This seems to suggest that a vacuum is produced by the electron beams passing by a point (because the electron is in a bound state), but in the screen of the detector, there seems to be no place for the positive electron to sit, and therefore no place to capture it into the bound state. A: I've been trying to understand a certain part of
